The word "communication" has its etymological roots in the Latin word "communicatus," derived from "communion," meaning sharing or belonging together. In terminology, communication denotes the process of transferring information from one person to another. Human communication involves individuals in various relationships, groups, organizations, and societies, who respond and create messages to adjust to the environment and each other. This process of communication includes people in different social contexts interacting, adapting, and exchanging messages. "Communication" is defined as 'the act of imparting, especially news' or 'the science and practice of transmitting information,' highlighting the close association between teaching and communication, as educators are continually sharing new knowledge and transmitting information.

Communication skill is a person's ability to communicate with his or her interlocutor, transfer ideas, ideas, feelings or data, both verbally and non-verbally with the aim of being able to achieve, fostering healthy relationships, such as social environment, school, business, work, etc. Good communication is a demand because it is used in various aspects of life, being able to communicate effectively is very beneficial for our lives because it can leave a good impression and improve good relations with the interlocutor. The ability to convey ideas, information or feelings, as well as data accurately, clearly and correctly is a benchmark for partners in our communication skills. Verbal and nonverbal communication skills by paying attention to communication ethics, by managing emotions positively, will increase success in building relationships with others and reduce the emergence of conflicts.

Some clear reasons will be given below why communication is crucial for human beings.

1. When you can communicate effectively, you can better teach skills to others.
2. Good communication skills can help you build strong relationships with the people around you.
3. Effective communication can help you better understand the world around you.

One of the most important skills in the workplace is effective communication. Communication is essential to maintain relationships with co-workers, superiors, and customers. Good communication skills can help to resolve conflicts, build relationships, and increase productivity. A few key things to remember when communicating effectively in the workplace: be clear, concise, and respectful.

In teaching process, communication is one of the main part because of this:

Good Communication Skills Keeps Students In Control

Unlike other professionals (like doctors, pilots, or engineers), teachers are not in control of their environment. It is not their job to manage the everyday operations of a classroom. However, in today's fast-paced society, teachers must exhibit leadership skills and positive behavior to ensure that students stay focused and have a positive relationship with the teacher and school.

Improves Students Learnings

Students need to be able to learn in a classroom setting if they are going to complete their education and then enter the workforce. On the flip side, students need to be able to understand and interact positively with teachers if they want an education that will help them reach their educational, career, and life goals.

Helps Teachers Spot Problems

By identifying potential problems with a student early, the teacher can adjust their plans accordingly to help the student reach their various educational goals. For example, suppose a student is slipping in school or exhibiting behavior outside the expected norm. In that case, an observant teacher can explore ways to adjust the class schedule, curriculum, and other activities to help support these students' needs in school.

Helps In Dealing With Special Needs Children

Basic communication skills will help teachers respond appropriately when their special needs child(ren) asks for extra attention or needs an emotional release from some type of stressor in he/her day. Skills such as patience and the ability to listen to what the child is trying to express or needing help with can make all the difference in a teacher's ability to support these students' needs.

Influencing Parents' And Students' Perceptions Of Teachers

Students and parents have much information about teachers based on their initial interactions, classroom interactions, and ongoing conversations with other students or parents who have had positive experiences with that teacher. Teachers who can remain positive and approachable and keep the lines of good communication skills open with students and parents tend to have fewer problems with their instructional program and professional reputation.

Decreases Teacher Turnover

Teachers who exhibit poor communication skills may not last long in a classroom job due to student or parent complaints or teacher resignations due to stress, burnout, or other issues related to the job.

Communication is a basic need for people who want to get professional reputation or promotion and also to be experts in their field. It is not just a bridge to success and also improving key because people can show their potential if they are connected with people who can give what they want. The importance of establishing good communication at a young age is critical in a child's development and future learning. The communication skills that students learn at school are fully transferable and essential across all aspects of life. Furthermore, it has been proven that supportive teacher-student relationships have a positive impact on class participation, engagement, and ultimately a student's achievements. Another important aspect of improving communication in any setting, but especially in the classroom, is to make students feel safe and comfortable contributing. We mentioned earlier about the importance of creating a safe and supportive environment, students will naturally develop communication skills but some will do so more gradually than others as they may have a fear of speaking in front of a group or lack confidence in what they have to say.

Conclusion

Communication is an important tool in finding a place in his career as well as in social life. Connecting with people is a fundamental step to get a remarkable experience and limitless career prospects because your communication is your confidence. So communicating and self-confidence play crucial roles in your life journey.
